Michele Corr, the executive director of the nonprofit Friends of Catholic Education, will be the Delaplaine Foundation's executive director, a newly created role where she will oversee the day-to-day operations of the foundation.

Corr will leave her position at Friends of Catholic Education (FOCE) and begin her new position on Jan. 6, according to a news release from the Delaplaine Foundation.

She has been FOCE's executive director since 2016. She will still be part of FOCE's Board of Trustees.

Prior to working at FOCE, Corr worked at St. John's Catholic Prep from 2007 to 2016 in several roles, including enrollment specialist and director of development.

The foundation's current president and CEO Marlene Young, whose responsibilities include overseeing the organization's daily operations, will retire officially in June.

Young said that the executive director role was created to accommodate the exponential growth of the foundation's work, prompting internal reorganization.

"We're thrilled that Michele has accepted the position of executive director," Young said in the news release. "Her professional experience and extensive knowledge of the community will enable her to lead the organization as it continues to grow."
